canals committee, who is one of the strongest opponents of the measure. Dating from tomorrow until a final vote is taken upon it the repeal will come up daily in the Senate. It is likely that at times it will be laid aside temporarily for the considerations of other business, and it could be displaced as the until inshed business of the Senate should a majority of that body vote to take up some other measure. But there is general acquiescence on the part of both friends and foes of the bill to continue with it until it is finally disposed of.

to the repeal of tolls exemption. Senator O'Gorman has announced that he will discuss the repeal bill Thursday. The debate is likely to continue for several weeks, though some senators optimistically assert the final vote should be had at the end of two weeks. Senator Gore, chairman of the agricultural committee, is endeavoring to have the agricultural appropriation bill disposed cf. Senator Walsh, chairman of the mines and mining committee, is anxious to get his radium bill out of the way, and yesterday sought to have it made the unfinished business of the Senate. He failed in this, however. Senator Smith of South Carolina, chairman of the immigration committee, is no less anxious to get before the Senate the immigration bill. But all of these measures will have to take their chances of being sandwiched in during the consideration of the tolls bill, or must wait until that measure is voted upon.
